Comic Book Storyboard

Now it's time to make the rough draft of your comic book. You will do this as a storyboard. A storyboard has very simple, rough sketches of the drawings you will do, and a description of what will be written with that drawing.

You must storyboard BOTH comics that you are drawing.

You can do this by hand (in your notebook or on separate paper) OR you can do it on the computer, your choice.

Your final comic book must have the following parts, so be sure to include them in your storyboard! Note that it is not required that your comic book pages go in this order.

- The first square must show the original image you started with (the actual picture, not a drawing). In this square you should describe or name the feature in your image
- Clearly state the process you think formed this image
- Model and explain how the feature was formed
- Model and explain how you know what process formed this feature

Directions: Fill in the storyboard below to help you organize your comic book. You must have a storyboard for each feature. Draw more squares if you need them
